FOREWORD

IN preparing this book of house plans it was necessary to consider present-day conditions. The specifications for the modern home should be: proper exposure, convenience in layout, compact kitchen, few halls, neat trim, comfortable stairs, plenty of stair head room, many light outlets at convenient locations, heating comfort, good framing, fire protection, windows at proper height from floor, air-tight walls and insulation.

The many plan books on the market at present neglect these necessary features. Many of these books are made of photographs of houses that are perhaps ten to fifteen years old. They do not include the qualities that should be in the up-to-date home. The past years have taught us much. We are no longer satisfied with large overhangs in cornices to collect icicles in winter. We do not desire the overcrowding of our homes with cut-outs, dirt collectors and other antiques. Architects are utilizing every inch of space in plans to the advantage of the owner.

To meet all ideas we have included wood, stucco and brick veneer homes in both the English and Colonial design. All these homes, being especially designed, have individual features. The traditions of the New England Colonial and the small English homes are carefully carried out in the designs in this book. Nothing has been overlooked to give you the advantage of the beauty and practicability of these styles combined with the most modern room layout.

It is not our intention to follow style blindly. Even good styles may have their weaknesses. That which was in keeping many years ago has become obsolete in this day when houses must be planned for the radio, air cooling, electric refrigeration, washing machines, etc. Study the following plans carefully to get the full benefits of our intensive work.

The plans and specifications that accompany these houses are surprisingly complete. They are drawn by architects of long years of experience and will pass the building laws of your city. The specifications are well worth your consideration. They protect you, the owner, against loss by fire, and include clauses in reference to the building laws, lien releases, time of payments, in fact every item to include proper completion of your home. Our contract forms have proven their worth through constant use. A building started right by having a good plan, a carefully written specification and a binding contract assures both the owner and builder of a happy relation and makes building a pleasure instead of drudgery.

With the vast decrease in prices there is no better time to build than the present. Never have the carpenter and other workmen given as much attention to their jobs as now. From material dealers to the painter your home is carefully given more time and better service than heretofore and you will appreciate these advantages only when you are settled in your own home.
